The authors used lateral three-dimensional finite element modeling to quantify the mechanical behavior of the human tibial plateau. In the tibial plateau, the contact zone and anteroposterior and mediolateral force transmission mechanisms were studied, with special emphasis on the effects of patellofemoral joint geometry on joint contact mechanics. The model included the patellofemoral joint in a laterally constrained arrangement with contact between the patellofemoral and trochlear articular cartilage, the patella and the tibial plateau articular cartilage. Joint axial compressive preloads were applied. The peak contact pressure was found to be significantly affected by the patellofemoral joint geometry, with the highest values observed on the anteromedial facet of the trochlea of cadaveric knees. Medial placement of the patellofemoral joint facet on the femoral articular cartilage increased the peak contact pressure considerably with respect to that on the lateral facet of the trochlea. The peak contact pressure was also affected by the degree of contact between the anterior cartilage and the
